What AI Gives, and What It Takes

An interdisciplinary panel discussion sharing experiences that reflect the values, emotions, and thoughts around this aspect of patient care, which is rarely explored.

Alex Choi, MD - physician, Palliative Care Program

William K. Oh, MD - physician, Director of Precision Medicine

Benjamin Tolchin, MD, MS, FAAN, FAES - physician, Director of Yale New Haven Health System Center for Clinical Ethics

Needs:
Clinicians and staff who care for long-stay patients often experience a complex mix of emotions, including fatigue, frustration, compassion, and attachment. These emotional responses can affect professional well-being, team dynamics, and the quality of patient care. This course aims to address the need to recognize, discuss, and address these feelings in a supportive environment to foster resilience, empathy, and healthy professional boundaries.

Objectives:
- Increase insight into social and emotional aspects of patient care
- Increase feelings of compassion toward patients
- Increase readiness to respond to patients and family's needs
